

45 Years

Director: Andrew Haigh
2014 (90')

Kate is planning a party to celebrate her and Geoff's 45th wedding anniversary but one week before the celebration a letter arrives which may change everything. The letter to Geoff says that the body of his first love has been found in the Alps, perfectly preserved in the ice from 1962.

This story is about whether secrets can be survived, whether the knowing or not knowing is more injurious. Haigh's very fine, classically modulated film keeps these questions alive until literally its last shot, and lets them jangle their way through you for days afterwards. The Telegraph

A movie so simple, so elegant, and yet so devouringly empathetic that you might not notice its full magic until a few hours later. The Playlist

The script is full of majestic, despairing notes; the look of the film is muted and wintry. The aural landscape is remarkable: from the opening noise of a slide projector working in the darkness (a pre-echo of Rampling in the attic looking at images of the woman her husband really wanted to marry) to the hummed tune of Smoke Gets in Your Eyes as she takes the fateful letter from the postman, all the sounds make for subtle emotional influence, beautifully thought out and arranged. Sight & Sound
